"I wish at times I could have been there myself, and you would have your grandpa. I am sorry."

Faces of young men

For almost 50 years, Gwen has worn the stones of Terry's wedding ring on a band on her finger, twisting it as she thinks of what her husband could have done with his life.

"I don't know if I ever got over it," Gwen said.

And Terry's photograph kept bringing it up. Author James

Wright interviewed her for his 2017 book "Enduring Vietnam," as she started to share more of her feelings, Christian said.

Christian didn't agree with his mother's opinion for a long time, thinking that Vietnam was a worthy attempt to stop communism.

But after watching the Burns documentary, which aired in 10 parts on PBS this fall, he said it showed "egos meddling in places they shouldn't be meddling."

Now he feels conflicted. His mother has retired as a teacher, then a social worker, but keeps busy in art groups, taking adult education classes and painting. Her late husband's art fills her condo.

But the war grew fresh in her mind again this fall while watching the Burns documentary.

American leaders lied to an apathetic population, she said, and she doesn't understand why we were there.

In the Vietnam War, 58,220 Americans died, including 853 Iowans.

She studied the faces of the young men and asked that people today thank veterans.

But also thinks about those families of the dead.

They are left with photographs and memories.
