MIA's Memorial

January 18, 2022 — A memorial service honoring four North Dakota Air National Guardsmen was reported on this day in 1970. The memorial came days after the four missing men were declared dead by the Alaska Air Command at the Elmendorf Air Force Base near Anchorage, Alaska.

The guardsmen, Eddie Stewart, Ingvald Nelson, Donald Flesland and Floyd Broadland, had been missing since August 27, when they had disappeared while on a mid-afternoon flight from Anchorage to the King Salmon Air Force Station, a flight of only two-hundred and fifty air miles. The Elmendorf Air Force Base near Anchorage served as a temporary base for the North Dakota Air Guard "during a two week training deployment" at this time.

The four men left the Elmendorf Air Force Base on August 27, 1969; this was the last time that anyone saw either the men or the C-54 four-engine transport plane that they flew.

After finding no evidence of either the plane or the men after four and a half months, the Alaska Air Command was compelled to change the status of the guardsmen from 'Missing in Action' to 'Declared Dead'. The command was quick to point out that "the discovery of any evidence pertaining to the aircraft...or the men, [would] reopen the formal search.

The families of the men, all of whom served within the 119th Fighter Group, elected to hold a joint memorial service in Fargo. Chaplain Major David Knecht of Bismarck presided over the service, held at Fargo's First Lutheran Church. Despite twenty below temperatures, nearly seven-hundred and fifty people, including North Dakota Governor William Guy, attended the service to pay their respects to the pilots. Major Lowell Lundberg of Fargo concluded the eulogy by saying, "These men and our comrades gave their lives in aerial flight over Alaska... while serving their state and their country. May God preserve their memories."

NDSU Sunflower Production update set

Sunflower producers and crop advisers interested in sunflower production management updates are encouraged to participate in the 2022 Getting-it-Right in Sunflower Production Conference on Tuesday, Feb. 1 from 8:30 a.m. to noon. This online-only conference will be hosted on Zoom.

The program will be conducted by North Dakota State University (NDSU) Extension and is supported by the National Sunflower Association. The conference is free to attend, but preregistration is required at <https://tinyurl.com/dfwbt4d>. All who preregister will receive emailed instructions on how to participate.

"The 2021 cropping season was dry with late season rain recharging the soil profile," says Hans Kandel, NDSU Extension agronomist for broadleaf crops. "Sunflower is a deep-rooting crop and was able to tap into some of the stored soil moisture." Every fall, researchers, Extension staff and consultants conduct an intensive survey of North Dakota sunflower fields in order to evaluate agronomics, weeds, diseases, and insect and bird damage as part of the National Sunflower Survey.

"Findings from the survey will be presented during the Zoom meeting," says Kandel. "These findings will provide agronomists and producers additional information to help them make timely decisions before and during the upcoming sunflower growing season."

"In addition, this sunflower educational event will provide research-based management recommendations that can also help producers with their sunflower production decisions," says Greg Endres, Extension cropping systems specialist and co-organizer of the event.

Topics that will be covered are hybrid selection, what has been learned from the fall 2021 sunflower survey, plant nutrient and soil management, updates for weed, disease and insect management, and sunflower marketing.

Attendees will receive useful links to several pertinent Extension sunflower production resources as reference materials, which are supplemental to the presentations.

The presentations will be recorded and archived. Certified crop adviser continuing education credits will be available for meeting participants.

Additional Getting-it-Right Zoom events are scheduled for:

- Tuesday, Feb. 15 - Canola production, link to register: <https://tinyurl.com/2p8z3km2>
- Tuesday, March 22 - Dry bean production, link to register: <https://tinyurl.com/wm45cnf4>
